Dish Network Acquiring Signal 535 Stuck.Partial genome sequence of the Fusarium oxysporum Fos sp. from wilted tomato in Hubei Province, China. A naturally occurring Fusarium oxysporum Fos that causes wilting symptoms in tomato in Hubei Province, China, was chosen as a candidate to obtain the whole genome sequence. With amplified fragment length polymorphism analysis, four single conidial isolates, with genetic similarity to the isolate obtained from wheat grains in China, were selected. Whole genome sequencing of the selected isolates and sequence annotation were carried out and were then compared with that of the isolate obtained from wheat grains. The genome size of the cultivated strain of F. oxysporum was between 32.0 and 32.8 Mb. The genome contained 5608 predicted genes and a number of putative effector genes were also predicted. Strains shared high similarity (99.5-99.7% identity) with the genome of the isolate obtained from wheat, the Japanese isolate F1-2, and the Swiss strain F14569. The percentage of repetitive elements in the genome of F1-2 was higher than those of the selected strains. A phylogenetic tree based on core genome SNPs showed that the selected strains were most closely related to F1-2 and SWS-F14569.[[R22]].
